Position of the course

In this advanced course, a historical survey of the poetical debates that have governed the development of Western literature is given. How did one reflect on literature and how does one try to understand and explain the importance of literary texts in the intellectual development of individuals and groups. The historical approach is meant to result in a deeper understanding of our ideas on literature today. The focus of this year's (26-27) course is on the idea that the reading of literary texts can have therapeutic effects in specific contexts of care - illness, mental suffering, grief.

Contents

Bibliotherapy is an age-old practice and conviction: the idea that the reading of texts can have a wholesome effect - c.q. a highly negative impact - is a central point of discussion in Antiquity. Plato famoulsy points out the dangers of poetry, while Aristotle is convinced of its positive, kathartic outcome.
The 'Greek' debate is the starting point of this course in which we will try to identify a number of arguments that have been central in the recent flourishing of bibliotherapy and in the work of a number of literary scholars who have helped give rise to the field of the so-called 'health humanities', a field of research in which a plea is being held for the importance of a humane and holistic form of care, in which patients and people in need of care are not being reduced to the illness or condition from which they suffer.
In this course we will read a number of key texts from different historical periods that have been central to the development of this rich field and that have shaped the specific position assumed by literary writings in this interdisciplinary field. We will read and discuss essays and other literary writings which allow for a deeper reflection on topics like illness, grief and mental instability.
