historical sociolinguistics, language variation in Dutch, 16th-20th century

Position of the course

The historical development of Dutch is more than the development towards standard Dutch. In the relatively new discipline of Historical sociolinguistics there is a focus on the sociolinguistic variation in the very earliest sources up to the recent past.

Contents

Starting from a number of case studies in the historical sociolinguistics of Dutch, we identify the relevant research questions, the available sources and the types of methodology that can be applied.

Initial competences

Final competences

- 1 Knowing what are the relevant research questions in historical sociolinguistics
- 2 Knowing what (types of) sources are available for reconstructing (the variation in) spoken Dutch from the past.
- 3 Being able to deal with the methodological and ideological challenges when reconstructing (the social stratification of) spoken Dutch on the basis of written sources.
- 4 Being able to analyse a document in an older variety of Dutch according to the principles of historical sociolinguistics.
- 5 Being able to report on the research in oral presentation(s) and a paper.

We expect from our students of Dutch that they further develop their reading, listening, writing and speech competences when they participate in this course unit. When evaluating students we expect a level of language proficiency that corresponds to the level of the course unit and its structural position in the curriculum.
