Position of the course

In this advanced course, a historical survey of the poetical debates that have governed the development of Western literature is given. How did one reflect on literature and how does one try to understand and explain the importance of literary texts in the intellectual development of individuals and groups. The historical approach is meant to result in a deeper understanding of our ideas on literature today. The focus of this year's (23-24) course is on the idea that the reading of literary texts can have therapeutic effects in specific contexts of care - illness, mental suffering, grief.

Contents

Bibliotherapy is an age-old practice and conviction: the idea that the reading of texts can have a wholesome effect - c.q. a highly negative impact - is a central point of discussion in Antiquity. Plato famously points out the dangers of poetry, while Aristotle is convinced of its positive, kathartic outcome.

The 'Greek' debate is the starting point of this course in which we will try to identify a number of arguments that have been central in the recent flourishing of bibliotherapy and in the work of a number of literary scholars who have helped give rise to the field of the so-called 'health humanities', a field of research in which a plea is being held for the importance of a humane and holistic form of care, in which patients and people in need of care are not being reduced to the illness or condition from which they suffer.

In this course we will read a number of key texts from different historical periods that have been central to the development of this rich field and that have shaped the specific position assumed by literary writings in this interdisciplinary field. We will read and discuss essays and other literary writings which allow for a deeper reflection on topics like illness, grief and mental instability.

Initial competences

To have a basic knowledge of literary theory and analysis.

Final competences

- 1 To have a thorough understanding of the poetical debates that determined and shaped Western conceptions of literary culture.
- 2 To be able to situate poetical texts in their cultural historical context.
- 3 To be able to analyse the rhetorical structure of poetical texts.
- 4 To be able to relate poetical debates to literary-historical developments.
- 5 To be able to connect poetical arguments to artistic debates.

Conditions for credit contract

Extra information on the teaching methods

Students are expected to come prepared to the course meetings as the course is premised in classroom discussion. To that end, students will be required to send the professor a short paragraph and a question in advance of each course session (at 7 pm on the evening before the class convenes at the latest) that evidences critical reading and wrestling with the text. These will serve as the basis for our collective discussion. Every student is expected to submit a written response each week [one paragraph!]

Learning materials and price

Students are expected to read the following texts during the semester:

1. Virginia Woolf, Mrs. Dalloway
2. Leo Tolstoj, The Death of Ivan Ilyich
3. Margret Edson, Wit

In addition to these texts, the course reader will contain fragments from writings by Plato, Aristotle, Shakespeare, Flaubert, J.M. Coetzee, Denise Riley en Philippe Forest.
