Position of the course

This course offers an introduction to an important segment of Western culture: the reception of the Metamorphoses of Ovid and the transformation of human and non-human subjectivities. Participants in this course shall observe the role of Greek and Roman culture in the construction of Western concepts of identity, in particular in contemporary texts and films.

Contents

This course consists of two parts.

In the first three meetings we shall discuss the most important terminology and approaches in reception studies.

In the second part we shall consider the complex and variegated reception of Ovid's Metamorphoses (1st century CE) in modern texts and movies. In particular, we shall discuss three kinds of reception of this highly influential Latin poem: 1) direct reworking of and clear references to episodes from the Metamorphoses; 2) thematic correspondences between Ovidian tales and modern literature and film; 3) Ovidian style of representation.

Initial competences

To have an elementary knowledge of European history and art history as acquired in secondary education, complemented with general historical and cultural historical courses in Ba1, or having acquired these competences in another way.

Final competences

- 1 Being able to elucidate and actively apply central theoretical concepts and cultural-critical terms from the course.
- 2 Being able to elucidate and identify various forms of reception.
- 3 To have general insight into the perception and creative use of the classics within new cultural products from different periods and cultural movements.
- 4 Being able to autonomously gain insights into the forms, functions and cultural contexts of classical reception pertaining to specific cultural products and to communicate those insights in a scientific manner.
- 5 Being able to autonomously formulate a critical perspective on the contemporary social relevance of the course contents.

6 Knowledge of the metamorphosis as a central topic in both ancient and contemporary art and culture.
