Position of the course

In the BA programmes Philosophy and Moral Sciences, this course is part of the modules "History and Text" (Philosophy) and "Philosophical Courses (Moral Sciences)". In this course students gain a more detailed overview of an important period in the history of philosophy through direct contact with primary texts. This provides students with a more in-depth knowledge of modern philosophy and a deeper understanding of some philosophical problems, concepts and arguments from this period. In addition, this course aims to teach students the skills needed to independently read, understand, analyse and evaluate philosophical texts from this period.

Contents

This course covers important (early) modern approaches to problems in the philosophical subdisciplines of philosophical anthropology, social and political philosophy, and philosophy of history. Specifically, it highlights the question of the nature and origin of language and examines how 17th- and 18th-century philosophers thought about the relationship between language, thought, and politics.

During the lectures, primary texts by Thomas Hobbes, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Immanuel Kant, Mary Wollstonecraft and others are placed in their historical context and read, commented on and discussed in class. In addition to the classroom processing of these texts, students read a text that is not discussed during the lectures independently in small groups (cartels).

Initial competences

This course is offered in the model programme in the first semester of the second Bachelor's programme. Students are expected to have a basic understanding of the history of philosophy and its periodisation and to be able to situate the modern period within this context, as well as to have already acquired a basic knowledge of general philosophical concepts and a basic competence in philosophical argumentation.

In addition, students are expected to have a good passive knowledge of English and French in addition to the language of instruction (Dutch). Passive knowledge of German is recommended but not required.

Final competences

- 1 Familiarity with important philosophical concepts, positions and arguments in the early modern period, with special attention to discussions about (1) language, (2) politics and/or (3) the relationship between the two.
- 2 Ability to situate the concepts, positions and arguments within these discussions in their context and relate them to each other, with attention to their contemporary relevance.
- 3 The ability to correctly characterize these concepts, positions, and arguments in one's own words.
- 4 The ability to independently read (early) modern philosophical texts, to identify their main concepts, theses, and arguments, and to characterize the latter in one's own words.

Conditions for credit contract

Access to this course unit via a credit contract is unrestricted: the student takes into consideration the conditions mentioned in 'Starting Competences'

Conditions for exam contract

Teaching methods

Group work, Seminar, Lecture

Extra information on the teaching methods

In the lectures, primary philosophical texts (or excerpts thereof) are discussed and analysed interactively under the supervision of the lecturers. Students are expected to prepare well for the lectures and to participate actively in the discussions during the lectures.

The group work consists of independently reading and discussing, in small groups and without supervision from the lecturers, a specified primary text.
