Keywords

Translation theory, translation practice, classics, Latin, Greek

Position of the course

This advanced course teaches students how to reflect on the premises of translating as a linguistic and a literary activity. The course teaches how to apply the main ideas of Translation Studies to the field of Classics and to form a well-founded opinion on existing translations. One of the goals of this course is to acquire better proficiency in literary translating.

This course allows students to progress on their learning curves regarding language proficiency (Latin and/or Greek) and literary studies (Latin and/or Greek) because of the central attention for the linguistic and literary analysis of the source text at the start of every translation project or study.

Contents

Capita selecta from theoretical, descriptive, historical and applied Translation Studies, with cases taken from (translations of) ancient literature. Departing from a solid theoretical basis, there is ample attention for practical application. Students translate texts from different genres, from Greek and/or Latin literature (depending on the languages they study). By analyzing existing translations during the seminars, practica and integration seminars they get acquainted with a representative amount of translation output in Dutch. Depending on the combinations of languages they study, examples in French, English and German ... will also be used. Students have to carry out a final individual assessment, where they have to write an introduction to and a translation of a short Greek or Latin text. This also includes writing a statement to describe the intentions behind the translation and evaluating their own work by giving account of their choices in translating.

Initial competences

To have successfully completed the following courses or to have acquired the necessary skills by other means:

- Introduction to Modern European Literature
- Ancient Literature in Translation
- (For students with Latin) Latin tradition in Europe
- Latin: language proficiency I and II and/or Ancient Greek: language proficiency I and II
- Latin literature I and/or Ancient Greek literature I

Final competences

- 1 To be aware of the relevance of Translation Studies for the study of the ancient languages and literature, and their reception history in European literature.
- 2 To be able to apply methods of Translation Studies to the (translations of) ancient literary texts.
- 3 To be able to form a well-founded opinion on existing translations, based on a sound analysis of the source text, the public the translation is aimed at, the intentions of the translator and/or his account of his choices.
- 4 To be able to write a report on the research activity worked on individually or in group.
- 5 To have an advanced feeling for different structures of language, registers and literary conventions of source and target language and to be able to make a well-founded choice for one's own translations, taking into account one's target audience and one's intentions in translating.
- 6 To be able to express a well-founded opinion on one's own capacities of translation, based on the public it is aimed at, the personal intentions in translating and by giving account of one's choices.
