Teaching languages

Dutch

Keywords

media, discourse, representation, Africa

Position of the course

This course forms a sequel to the course 'Language, Culture, and Society in Africa (I)'. The aim is to critically assess texts and images from various areas (media, arts, tourism, academia, ...) in which (problematic) representations of Africa, Africans and Afro-descendants prevail.

Contents

This course is aimed at teaching students how to critically assess discourse and representation of Africa through postcolonial theories, the history of ideas, and discourse-analytical theorising. Processes of representation of Africa will be related to one another and placed within their historical (colonial) context. Topics like white saviour complex, white-washing and white privilege will be discussed.

From a contextual framework the students will subsequently analyse a chosen text or body of texts that concretizes the discussed topics.

Initial competences

Having successfully completed the course 'Language, Culture and Society in Africa (I)' or having acquired the competences thereof by other means.

Final competences

- 1 Having acquired a profound knowledge of patterns and recurrent processes of representations of Africa.
- 2 Having acquired a profound insight into the relations between language (use), textual representation and media in/from Africa and to be able to put this insight into practice.
- 3 To be able to critically reflect on representation as linguistic, textual and social process.
- 4 To be able to prepare and conduct a modest research project from a discourse analytical angle and to be able to present the results both orally and in writing.
