Position of the course

Historians working on Ancient history, history of the Middle Ages or Cultural history of the Early Modern Era often come across sources written in Latin. This course offers support to students who, for example for their master thesis, wish to make use of Latin literary and historiographical texts, but also inscriptions, documentary sources, archival material, church documents etc. It introduces students to reading and interpreting a wide range of Latin texts, including texts that differ from classical Latin in vocabulary and grammar, and that have sometimes never been translated before.

Contents

In a first series of seminars, students read a wide variety of Latin texts from Antiquity to the Early Modern Era. Particular attention is given to matters of grammar, vocabulary and style, and several tips & tricks for reading Latin texts are given. Historical content and context are also discussed.
A second series of seminars take the form of microteaching (student presentations): students present their own reading and interpretation of a chosen Latin texts, and engage in dialogue about this with their fellow students and with the lecturer.

Initial competences

A good basic knowledge of Latin as offered e.g. in the BA course Latin Language I (A000779), or throughout secondary school, potentially updated in the BA course Historical texts: Latin (A004005).

Final competences

- 1 Understand Latin texts from Antiquity to the Early Modern Era in the original language (with the help of dictionaries etc.).
- 2 Refer to precise formulations in the original language when interpreting Latin historical sources.

- 3 Make independent use of Latin texts as sources for historical research, and presenting the results both orally and in writing.
- 4 Be attentive to linguistic nuances and for the added value of reading Latin historical sources in the original language.
- 5 Engage in critical interpretative discussion of Latin texts.
- 6 Have knowledge of the main evolutions of the Latin language from Antiquity to the Early Modern Era.
