Contents

This course is a detailed introduction to Theatre Studies and Performance studies. It starts with an overview on the history and development of both the continental orientated Theatre Studies and the Anglo-Saxon model of Performance Studies. The student will be introduced to the basics of Theatre Studies and to its conceptual apparatuses. Here, the aim is to explore exactly what a staging is and what the possible concepts are for filling in this concept. Attention is also paid to the relationship between theatre and text: What exactly is a drama? What are the historical conditions and structural characteristics of drama and how does drama evolved into a post dramatic poetics and esthetics today? During the semester, specific theories and research models within Theatre Studies and Performance Studies will be presented. Because in the first half of the twentieth century Theatre Studies grew out of an interest in theatre history, an important section will be devoted to theatre historiography. Here we examine what theatre historiography can be, what methods can be used for this purpose. Since the second half of the twentieth century, Theatre Studies focus on the phenomenon of the performance itself, especially in relation to the experience of the viewer. With the emergence of Performance Studies in the 1970s, broader social and cultural phenomena were studied alongside the performing arts. These aspects are also discussed extensively, whereby we analyse how we can interpret a theatrical performance: What exactly does it mean to perform and to observe in a radically altered performance practice for which the performing arts in Flanders are renowned throughout the world? According to which frameworks do we analyze a theatrical performance? We will deal with semiotics and its criticism, principles of theatricality and performativity, and gender, queer and postcolonial studies. In this way, both canonical approaches and more recent models of Theatre and Performance Studies are presented. All the aforementioned theoretical models will be used to analyse running productions.
