Position of the course

The Middle East and North Africa (MENA) region has played a pivotal role in shaping global history and culture since the 19th century. It has been a site of colonial encounters, nationalist movements, and modernization efforts, profoundly influencing its political and social structures. The region's rich cultural heritage intersects with the legacies of imperialism, the formation of modern nation-states, and the search for identity amid rapid social change. These processes gave rise to diverse political ideologies, from Pan-Arabism to Islamism, and movements calling for reform, resistance, and revolution. The Arab Spring exemplified the enduring hope for freedom and democracy, while ongoing struggles with authoritarianism, economic challenges, and social inequalities continue to shape the region's trajectory. This course explores the historical and cultural dynamics that have shaped the modern and contemporary MENA region, focusing on its global impact and complex entanglement.

Contents

Through interactive classes and the reading of a variety of sources students acquire knowledge of and insight into the historical, cultural and socio-religious dynamics that have shaped the modern and contemporary Middle East from the nineteenth century until today.
