Keywords

Literature, Dutch, Early Modern Period; landscape history, ecocriticism, topical debates

Position of the course

The course aims at gaining a more in-depth knowledge of early modern Dutch literature that students have acquired in the general overview in the bachelor-course Dutch Literature: Early Modern Period.

Contents

This course introduces students to a subfield of Dutch literary history, which will be discussed in relation to concepts from literary theory and philosophy and topical social questions. In a series of introductory lectures, students will be acquainted with a selection of literary texts from the 17th and 18th centuries. These include themes such as city and literature, colonial literature from a postcolonial perspective and ecocritical approaches to early modern nature poetry. The theme for 2026-2027 is: Man, Nature and Landscape in Early Modern Dutch Literature (1600–1800).

During the introductory lectures, we will take a look at the relevant historical context, followed by an examination of the characteristics of various genres featured in the course, such as drama, poetry, and the novel. Through the works of influential authors in the field of (post)colonial or ecocritical literary and cultural studies, different analytical frameworks will be introduced, which are crucial for studying the representation of the city, nature, or the colony in early modern

Dutch literature. Students will be challenged to examine these works from various perspectives and engage in discussions with each other. Each student will present one of these works to the group based on a hypothesis formulated from a literary-theoretical or (cultural) philosophical perspective and engage in debate with a fellow student.

This course also hones academic discussion skills through debates on the studied texts in light of current social and theoretical issues. The oral exam is not a mere test but a discussion with the teacher that aligns with the debate in class with fellow students.

Initial competences

On the basis of the preceding bachelor education, the student is familiar with the history of the different periods of Dutch literature and with the principles of literary theory. More concretely, this course builds on the final competences of the course 'Nederlandse Letterkunde III'.

Final competences

- 1 He/she should be able to investigate independently and critically a proposed subject on the basis of scholarly literature.
- 2 He/she should be able to discuss a historical text in relation to modern theoretical or philosophical concepts and topical social questions.
- 3 He/she should be able to explore alternative perspectives on a literary text based on alternative readings, setting up a proposition to investigate and also to provoke further discussion.
- 4 He/she should be able to report orally on the results of his/her personal investigation and to discuss these results with other students.
