Position of the course

This course is an introductory course aiming to provide students with insights in the main domains of psychology and sociology and their relevance to business administration, economy and public administration. Within the course 'People and Society' there is an emphasis on the scientific study of people, behavior and society.

Contents

Topics that are covered include on the one hand psychological topics and subdisciplines such as motivation, emotion, perception and rational thinking, personality, positive psychology and health. On the other hand, the following sociological insights are covered, f.e. culture, learning and work, social inequality and change. We focus on the discussion of the relevance of these topics and subdisciplines to business administration, economy and public administration.

Initial competences

Final competences

- 1 Explain sociological and psychological concepts and theories
- 2 Apply sociological and psychological concepts through practical examples
- 3 Insight into different ways of sociological and psychological thinking
- 4 Understanding of the relative relevance of sociology and psychology for other 'disciplines', such as business administration, economy and public management
